

TRIUM ALTERNATIVE GROWTH FUND

DECEMBER 2025 MONTHLY NEWSLETTER

F GBP: -0.4% YTD: +5.8% | GBP: -0.4% YTD: +5.6%

Strategy Description

- The Trium Alternative Growth Fund uses Uncorrelated Strategies sourced from across the asset class spectrum to provide capital growth, independent of equity market cycles and macroeconomic environments. The Fund targets areas of markets that demonstrate significant crowding and congestion. Congested markets cause short and long-term price distortions, and these can be monetised without taking directional market exposure.
- Congestion style trades are naturally defensive and tend to have their best returns during periods of stress. Therefore, the Fund has a defensive profile and has demonstrated both a consistent negative correlation and beta with equity markets.
- The Fund aims for Cash + 3-4% annualised return with a relatively low volatility of 3-5%.

Portfolio Manager's commentary

December 2025 was a lacklustre month for all asset classes with the exception of the precious metals complex. Bonds were slightly down, as were equities, while precious metals continued their stellar ascent. However, the show was again stolen by silver, which returned 26% and at one point had reached 40% over the Christmas period.

While silver's absolute performance was truly historic over December, its relative performance versus equities, crypto, and bonds was equally astonishing, given that December was a month when the Fed restarted QE. The Fed (to avoid calling it QE) started buying $40bn per month in T-bills (using the obfuscating term "Reserve Management Purchases" (RMP)), while the US Treasury has committed to buying back long-term treasuries and reissuing T-bills directly to the Fed. This not-so-subtle 'bait and switch' is actually more potent than normal QE as it not only pushes fresh cash into the system, but as the T-bills are of such short duration, this cash is constantly recycled and, as such, has a higher velocity (read inflationary). While the kickstarting of the printing press was always an inevitability given the financing needs of the US administration, what was a surprise was how little equities and bonds reacted when compared with the explosive move in precious metals: this is the first time QE has failed to propel equities higher. This seems to me to be a step change in investor psychology, a collective realisation that endless money printing is destroying the value of fiat money and by extension nominal assets: the debasement trade in full swing.

Yet while all eyes were on either the silver market or their Turkey Christmas dinner, the standing repo facility at the Fed (an overnight facility for injecting cash into the banking sector) began to flash red. While only used in times of stress, some $200bn was given to as yet unknown banks that were having a spot of bother with their cash flow. What's more, as the repo facility is a collateralised lending 'market', the vast majority of the collateral offered to the Fed was lower quality mortgage-backed securities, which in itself is a credit stress signal as it is sign the private repo market has concerns over said collateral and only the Fed (which doesn't care about such trivialities) is prepared to accept it.

As one tries to discern the causes of the cashflow problems in the banks, spare a thought for the bullion banks, who would have suffered epic margin calls on their short silver paper positions, as not only did silver explode, but margins were repeatedly hiked over the Christmas period. Whether it's nascent trouble in the mortgage market or margin stress in silver, the banking sector was once again rewarded with a Fed-wrapped Christmas bailout, and everyone was none the wiser: a silent night where all is calm and all is (silver) bright.

The portfolio had a poor month, with the Fund down 0.4% (F GBP). The contributions to returns were well spread across the portfolio.

Our best performing strategies over the month were our precious metals positions in the macro hedge bucket. The positions in the macro hedge bucket (see the attribution below) are intended to hedge out unwanted betas and protect the portfolio from Fed money-printing episodes. The Fund's congestion strategies and, in particular, our long equity vol strategies are particularly vulnerable to Fed liquidity injections, as the sole purpose of these injections is to reduce volatility and restore calm to markets. Precious metals are currently experiencing a physical supply squeeze and responding to the debasement theme, and this squeeze is exacerbated whenever the Fed prints. Over December, our worst-performing strategies were our equity-based congestion strategies. While the QE did very little for equity index prices, as discussed above, it did 'succeed' in collapsing implied vols across macro space, which pushed our long vol strategies into the red. But this was nicely counterbalanced by our precious metal's allocation in the macro hedge bucket.
